freshwater pearls

A product of freshwater mussels, these pearls have a beautiful opalescent sheen. They are a charming complement to the rich colors of the tagua and acai beads used in Faire Collection's jewelry.

tagua (tahg-wah)

The Tagua nut grows from the Ecuadorian Ivory Palm, which is commonly referred to as "vegetable ivory." Tagua grows from regenerative pods, which emerge from the palms' trunks. The pods are removed from the palm and the seeds are left to dry in the sun. Once they are dried out, the seeds can be used to create jewelry.

acai (ah-sai-ee)

Açaí seeds come from the Açaí palm, which is found in the lush rainforests of South America. Small dark purple berries grow in dense clusters on the palm, and each contains a single seed about 0.25-0.4 inches in diameter. The fruit is harvested for food, and is most often served as a beverage. The seeds, however, are dried out and used to make jewelry.

pambil (pam-beel)

Pambil seeds come from Iriartea excelsa, a canopy tree of South America. This palm is an essential resource for the Quichua culture of Peru and Ecuador. Its wood is used for constructing houses, lances, bows, and blowpipes, and the leaves are woven into roofs of native huts. The Pambil palm's fruit, approximately one inch in diameter, contains the seed that is used in Faire Collection's jewelry.

achiras

These seeds come from the Achira plant, which is native to South America and produces beautiful red flowers. The seeds are small, round, and dense enough to sink in water. They are widely used for jewelry, but are also used for maraca shakers in some cultures.

lagrimas

These tear-shaped seeds are harvested from a tall, grain-bearing plant commonly known as Job's Tears. The plant is native to Southeast Asia but is also grown in South America. The seeds are gray-blue in color and have been used to make jewelry for many years.

netting

All of the Smateria bags are made from netting. In Cambodia, this netting is used for many different purposes such as fishing, drying rice, and sifting sand at construction sites. Smateria artisans purchase the netting from local markets and sew it into bags and accessories.

bike chain

Iron bike chain is sourced in India and reformed by Helping Hand Artisans into beautiful bracelets and cuff links.
